The Croatian–Hungarian Settlement of 1868 established the legal framework demarcating Croatian autonomy from joint affairs under central government control. This lecture offers a critical re-evaluation of the Settlement, arguing that its inherent hybridity—a synthesis of pre-modern constitutionalism and modern governance—created a doctrinal impasse that positivistic scholarship has failed to resolve. The analysis explores how this 19th-century interpretative paradigm persists through the unresolved debate over whether Croatia-Slavonia was a ‘state’ or a ‘province’. Such an academic status quo suggests that a shift toward a broader doctrinal perspective is essential for a comprehensive analysis of the era’s institutions. Consequently, the lecture argues that Croatian autonomy should be interpreted as a ‘hybrid zone’ rather than through a strictly positivistic lens. It further demonstrates how the Settlement, despite its constraints, provided the formal institutional space necessary for the formation of modern Croatian institutions. By placing Croatia in a comparative context with autonomous Finland and Iceland, this lecture elaborates a distinct ‘autonomous path’ of state-building within the broader European experience. Ultimately, this critical case study helps to understand similar processes shaping governance and sovereignty in a contemporary context.
